Well, that honestly can be considered the closest definition of cinema as can be said from a viewer's experience. Movies not only let us feel varied emotions but also allow us to view the world beyond the periphery of our vision, the most off - of - the - bon incidences and extraordinary ideas all while giving us glimpses of lives that most of us can only dream of living.

Growing up in a quite essential Assamese household, movies have always been a major part of the family sphere. Uncountable memories have been made while watching stellar performances by stalwarts like Nipon Goswami, Chetana Das and Biju Phukan. As the likes of Jyoti Das, Jatin Bora, Barasha Rani Bisaya and Angoorlata Deka graced the screen of Assamese films, a new wave of commercially successful movies made their way to the audience. ## FILM INDUSTRY OF ASSAM

Assamese cinema is an Indian film industry of Assamese language. It is based in Assam, India.

The origins of Assamese cinema can be traced back to Rupkarunwar Tyohirprasad Agarwala, who was also a noted poet, playwright, composer and freedom fighter. Agarwala is considered as the father of Assamese cinema.

The industry was born in 1935 when he released the film Toymoli or Toimoli. Based on Lakshminath Bezbaroa's play about the 17th century Ahom Princess Toymoli Jhunuari, the film was starred by Sidere Handique and acclaimed stage actor and playwright Phani Sarma. The film, shot between 1933 to 1935, was released by Chitralekha Movietone on 10 March 1935 and marked the beginning of Assamese cinema. Since then the Assamese cinema has developed a slow ~~paced~~ paced sensitive style. In beginning the industry were called Tollywood, named for Agarwala's Tyohir chitnabon Film studio.

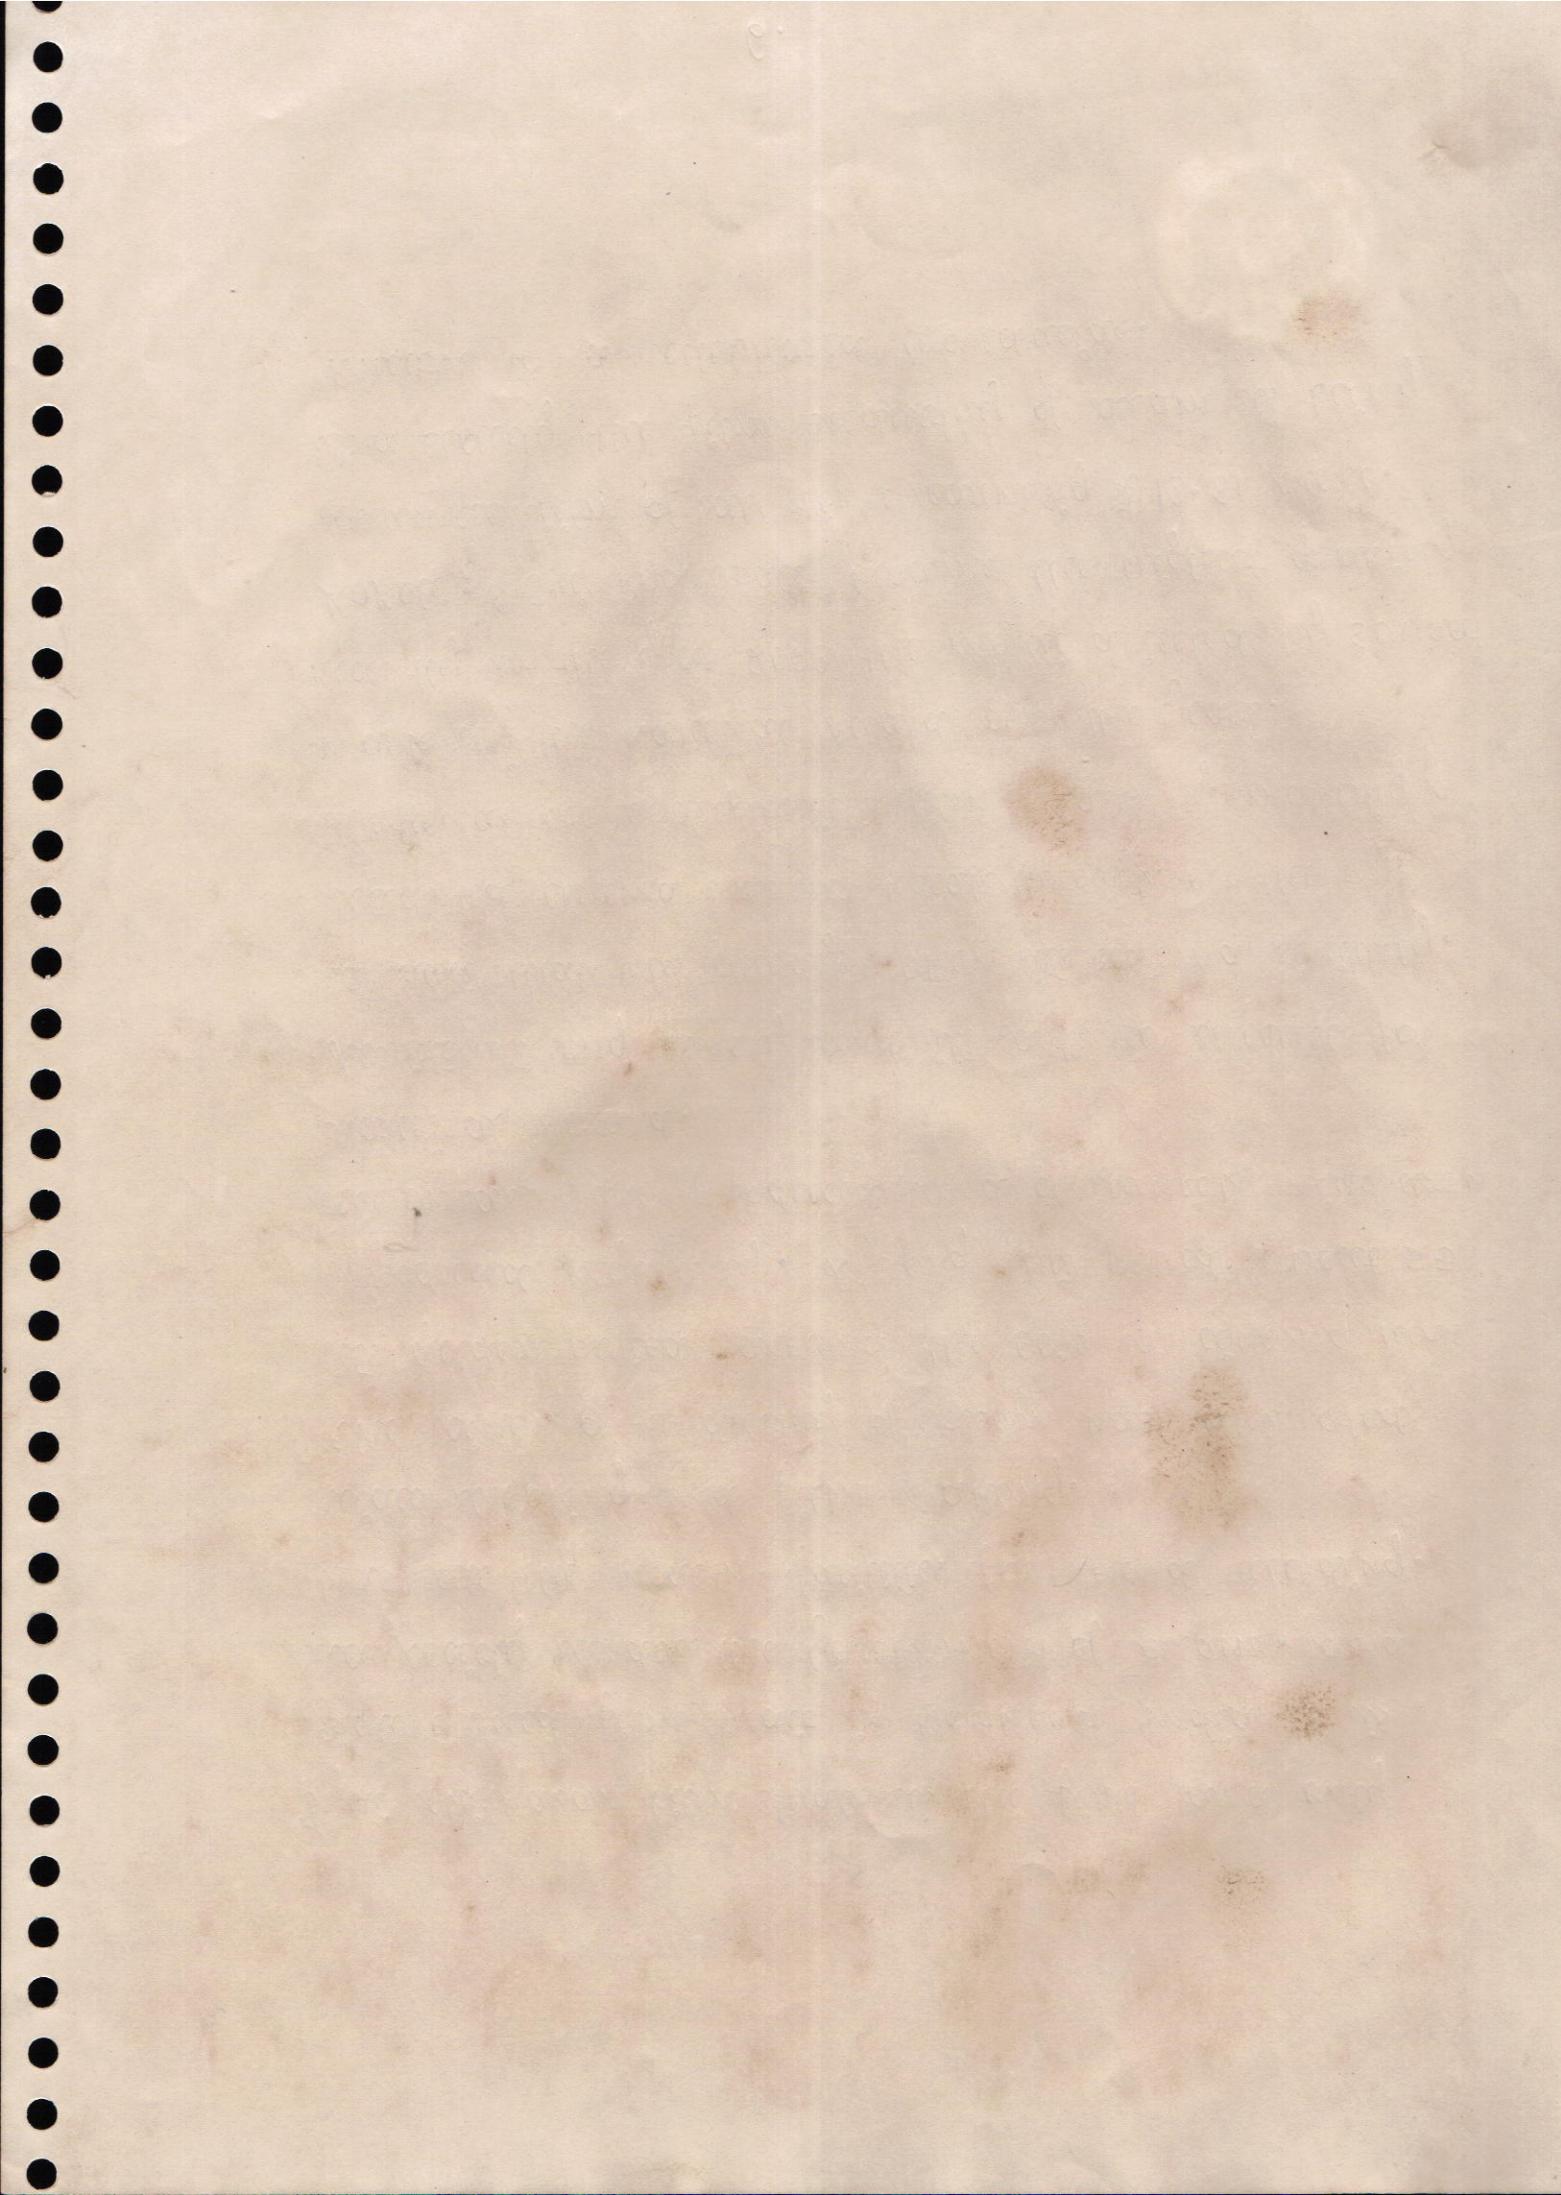

Tyoli chitraban Film studio is the first and only state owned film studio in Northeast India. It is a society under the Government of Assam, and has all the modern facilities for sound recording, video shooting and film making.

The cinema Industry of Assam has celebrated its golden period around the 60's as cinema was produced regularly. During this period about 25 cinemas were produced and of which nine won National Award.

Despite its long history and its artistic successes for a state that has always taken its cinema seriously, Assamese cinema has not break through on the National scene despite its film industry making a mark in the National Awards over the years.

Recently in the year 2023 the movie directed by Suvar Kakoti; 'Sri Raghupati' became the highest grossing Assamese film of all time earning ₹ 13.81 crore. And slowly the film Industry of Assam is being known and celebrated worldwide.

THE BARD OF BENGAL

Tagore has grown up amidst Bengal which marks the culture and essence of long British rule and slavery.

Rabindranath Tagore was the 14th born child to his parents, Debendranath Tagore and Sharada Devi.

Tagore's presence at home and around has been one of a kind which marks a departure for a literature of his own created at a time when Tagore's mother Sharada bade goodbye from the soil of Bengal and his brother Jyotindranath Tagore who gave Tagore the right to live and laugh. Next to his mother was his sister-in-law, Kadambari who wedged and ushered a sense of love and hope to take Tagore's brilliance into possibilities of changing the world through poetry and tales. Tagore's poems act as a necklace of eternal bliss and solitariness. One of his most outstanding poems was "Walk alone" better known in Bangla as "Ekla Cholo Re". It says if no one listens to you and the world turns around, you should walk your path alone. With several other poem collections like "Baghban", his early days of romanticism were forever printed in the Kalkata diaries.

"Gitanjali" which won the 'Nobel prize' for literature marks the budding of his time and devotion to his poetry. It's said Human reaches to its peak of creativity being alone and it did for Tagore.

He is also known widely as 'Kobi Gurui' meaning 'Poet Gurui'. Anything that one wants to say, Tagore says it better. Reading Tagore can make you travel the golden realms of variety and wonder.

MICRO TALES

Looking at the moon, she sighed. It's been ages since she last saw her husband. She could only endlessly wait, but never call out. The bastard had slashed her throat.

The red stain on the skirt of her school uniform made it difficult for her to face the class the next day. After that ominous night, her neighbour faced the world with a red stain on her face everyday.

Feeling like indulging herself after so long, she visited her parents for a week-long stay. As she was enjoying her favorite dish, something she hasn't had in a while due to her husband's dislike, her mother asked - "When are you planning to invite us to your place?"

She touched the fabric of her brother's newly sewn shirt and felt a pang of grief. Going to do the dishes, she saw her mother use the remaining fabric to patch the holes in her skirt.

She came to her cabin with a dejected face. He, meanwhile, celebrated the promotion she worked so hard for. They would both become parents. Him, with a promotion and her, without. It was his wife who resigned after the marriage, who was now pregnant, not him.

FROM THE GRAVE

It was peaceful, being dead.

Almost like sleeping, except he was no longer being plagued by his thoughts. The constant guilty murmurs inside his head, the would haves, should haves and could haves that had kept him up at night for what seemed like forever now, had finally quietened. They no longer held any power over him. James did not know if it was possible for a dead person to feel elated, but he did. Sad, some might say, but that was just James' life.

It was initially hard to come to terms with, the fact that he was dead, but James adapted himself alarmingly quick. And to think that he had never quite been the adaptable sort when he was alive. Does death truly change people, or was that just him? It still is hard to believe that he isn't a part of his body anymore. He could not touch anything, he could not feel and he realised that he also could not think anything.

which would allow him to feel. Oh, how James had longed to not be able to think. And now he was just there, an unaudible, invisible, thoughtless mist with some memories.

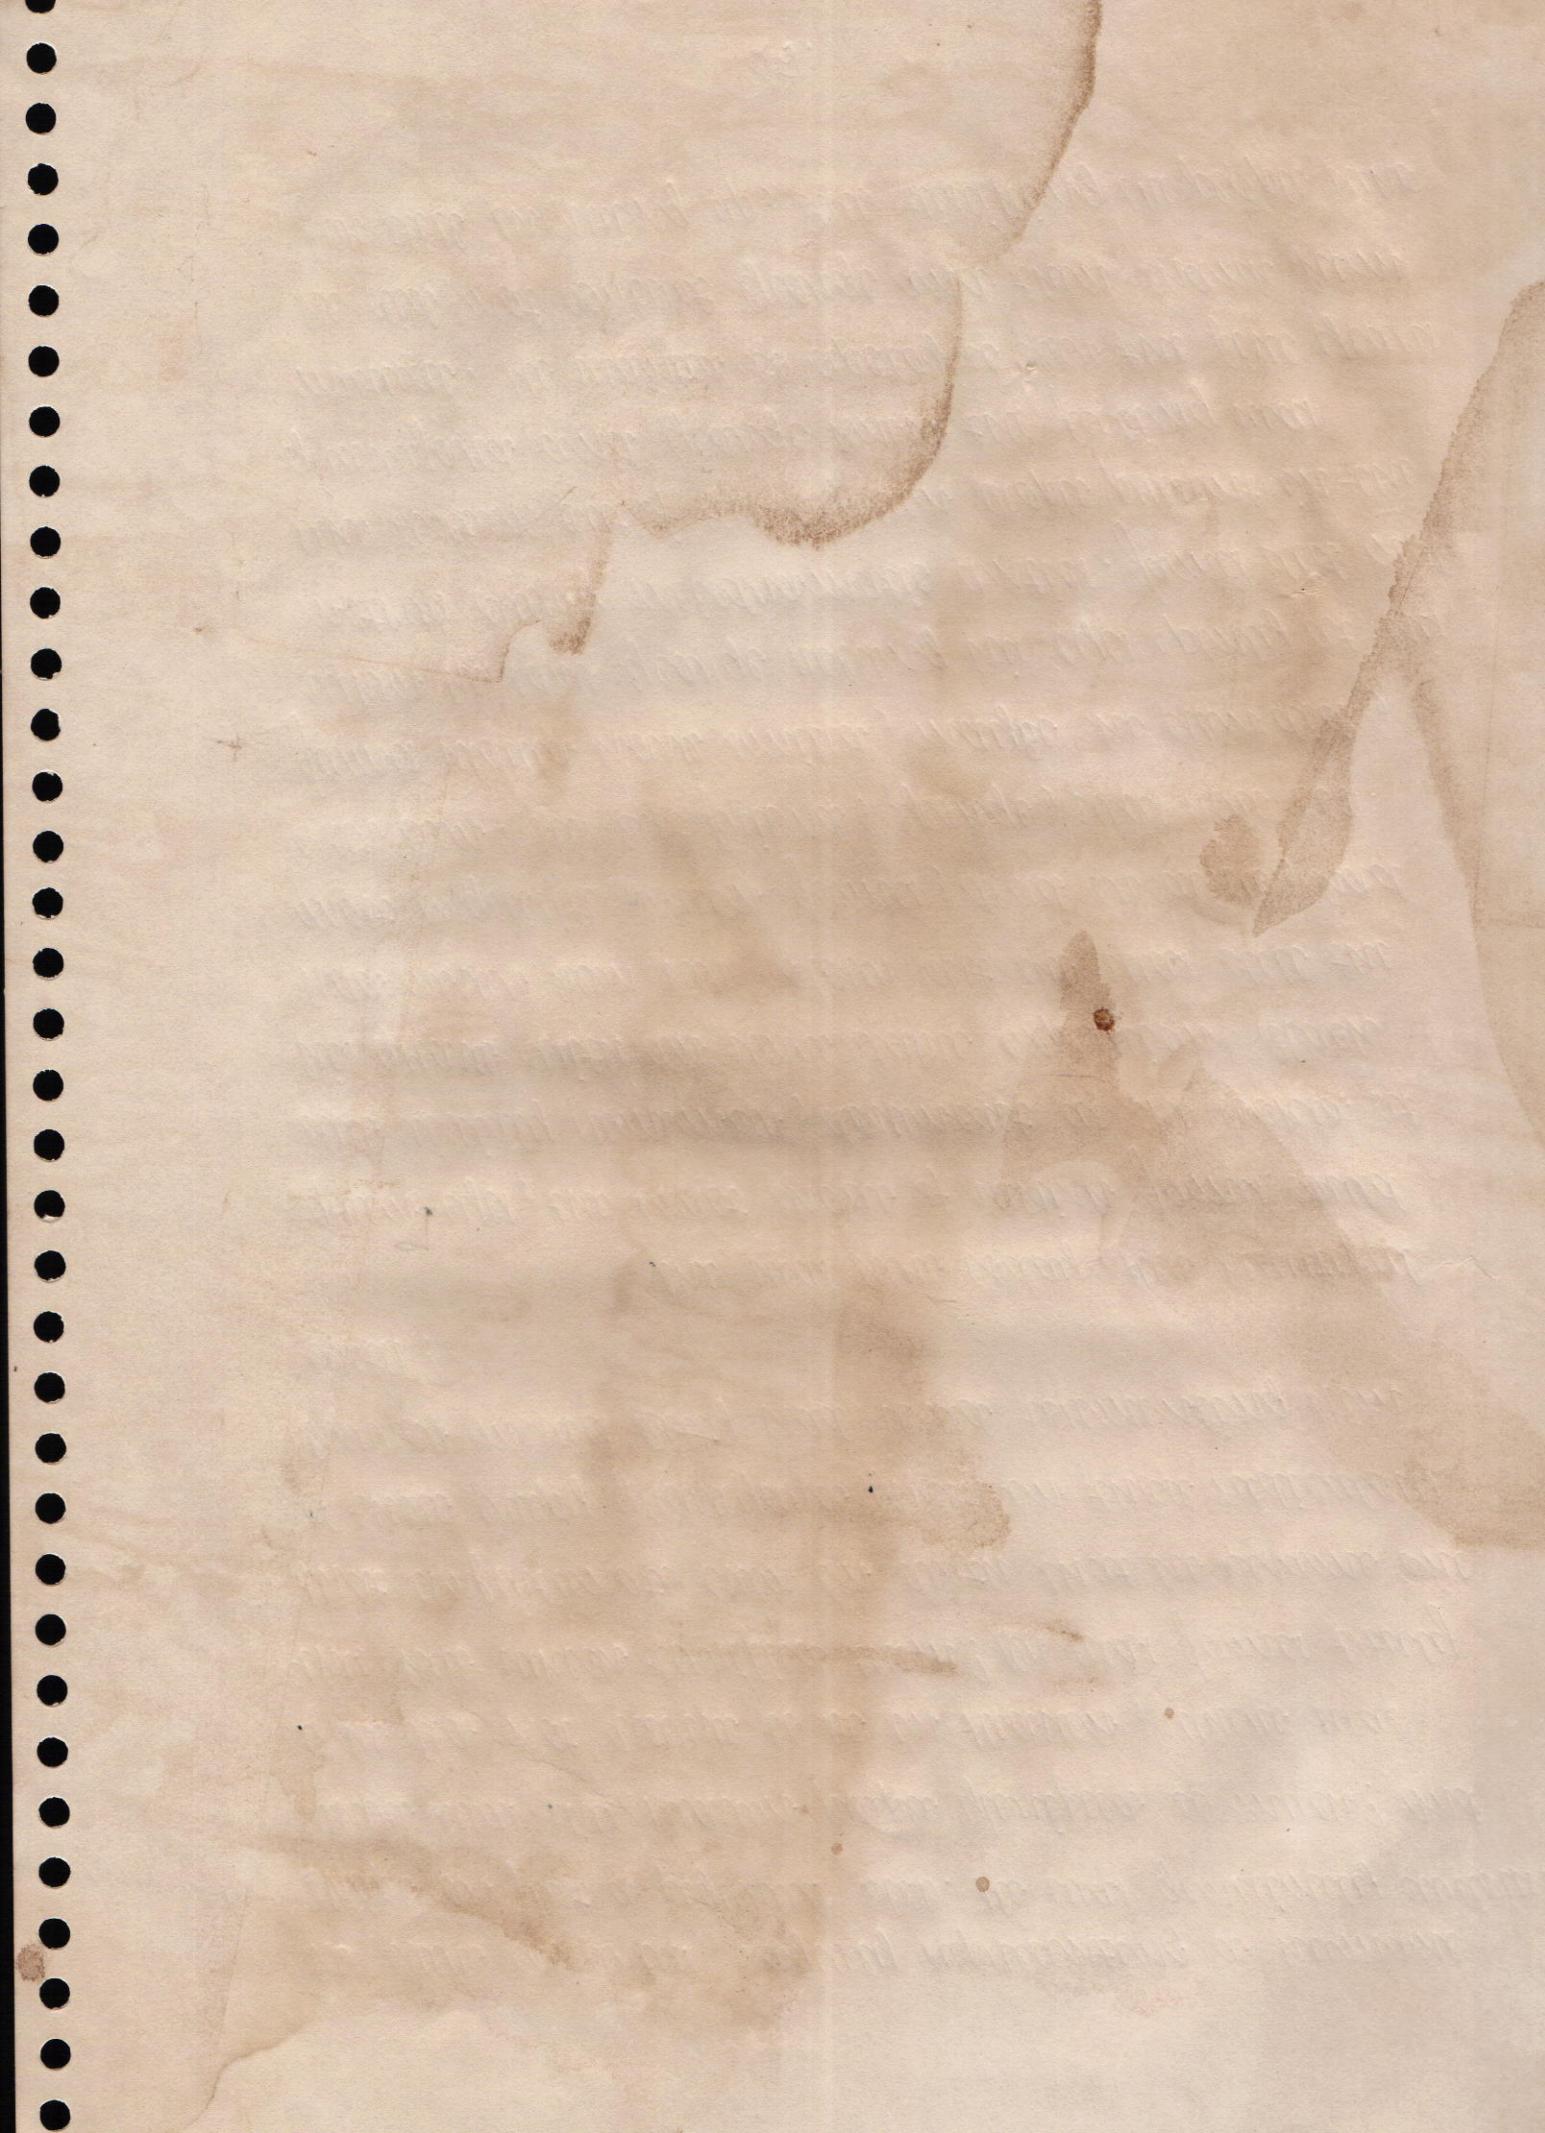

Everything was dead quiet in the graveyard, unless one counted the rustling of the wind and his mother's occasional sniffles. James almost chuckled at his train of thoughts, before whispering to himself, "Now probably isn't the time to be making puns". He later realised that he should have saved himself the trouble, it wasn't as if anyone could hear him anyway. Ironic, truly, how James had gone and died in his sleep when that was the one thing alongside his own mind which had been a nemesis to him dating as far back as his teen years. He wondered if the people suddenly pretending to care about him thought, the same.

He wasn't expecting his mother to be inconsolable or play the ever so doting mom but really, if he could he would surely ask her to cease with her pathetic attempts at acting sad. If souls could scoff, James was pretty sure his right about now. He wished he could see himself, see if he were colourless, vaguely representing a humane shape or just a featureless blob. He was genuinely curious. Where was this Heaven people glorified so much? And if he did not deserve to be in Heaven, where was this Hell which terrified them? Or was James truly that unfortunate even in death that he became one of those creepy graveyard ghosts in those ridiculous horror movies Betty had loved tormenting him with?

She was here today. Her beautiful green eyes, the exact shade of which James could still vividly remember, downcast as she looked at his grave with an unreadable expression. Black had never been her colour but she was still the most exquisite person James, dead or alive, had ever seen. His best friend, George, was here too. James would have smiled, maybe he even did, when he saw George rolling his eyes openly at his mother's overly melodramatic antics. James did not like sixteen out of the eighteen people present in the graveyard and George knew the feeling was mutual. He wanted to apologise for the five years he did not contact George and then thank him for still showing up, still disliking the people who who weren't good to James even more than James himself. Friendship truly was the purest of all bonds but just like everyone else James had managed to push George aside as well.

They started leaving one after another, staying for barely ten minutes and saying a few prayers. His mother was the first to leave. But Betty stood there, expression still inscrutable. He saw George giving her elbow a comforting squeeze before he too left but not without a final, sad glance towards James' grave. He could have sworn he heard George muttering something along the lines of, "You and your habit of leaving without saying good-bye. You had to go and die just to avoid apologising?", but he was too distracted by the sight of Betty finally walking towards his grave.

"I am doing okay, not that you asked or anything", Betty said with a tearful smile once George was out of earshot. "George is might, you know? You took the easy way out once again, Jamie. Forty-eight is too young. We were due for a dramatic reunion in our fifties? James wished he had lost the ability to hear as well. He might be dead but this was too much even for him. It was his funeral, he shouldn't be the one crying.

But James also wished he could be audible again, even for a minute, just one minute to tell her how sorry he was and how he'd never forgotten her. Not for a moment. He wanted to tell her that if he could he would turn back time and never get in Augustine's car. He only wished he could have realised it sooner that the only place that car would be driving him to was somewhere far away from Betty. He wished he could have realised it sooner that one teenage mistake could haunt you forever.

When you're a teenager you think you know everything but James never pretended to be a know-it-all. He did not know everything but the one thing he did know was that he had loved Betty. And then he had hurt both her and Augustine. He deserved to feel like the worst person for feeling guilty about hurting just one of them. All James wished for was one last minute to apologise. "It's okay, I forgive you, we were just kids. Looking back, I realise we had so much more to learn. I know you didn't mean to hurt me. You were arrogant, impulsive, quick to anger but you were also the best thing that ever happened to me. I could never regret you and I just pray that you don't either."

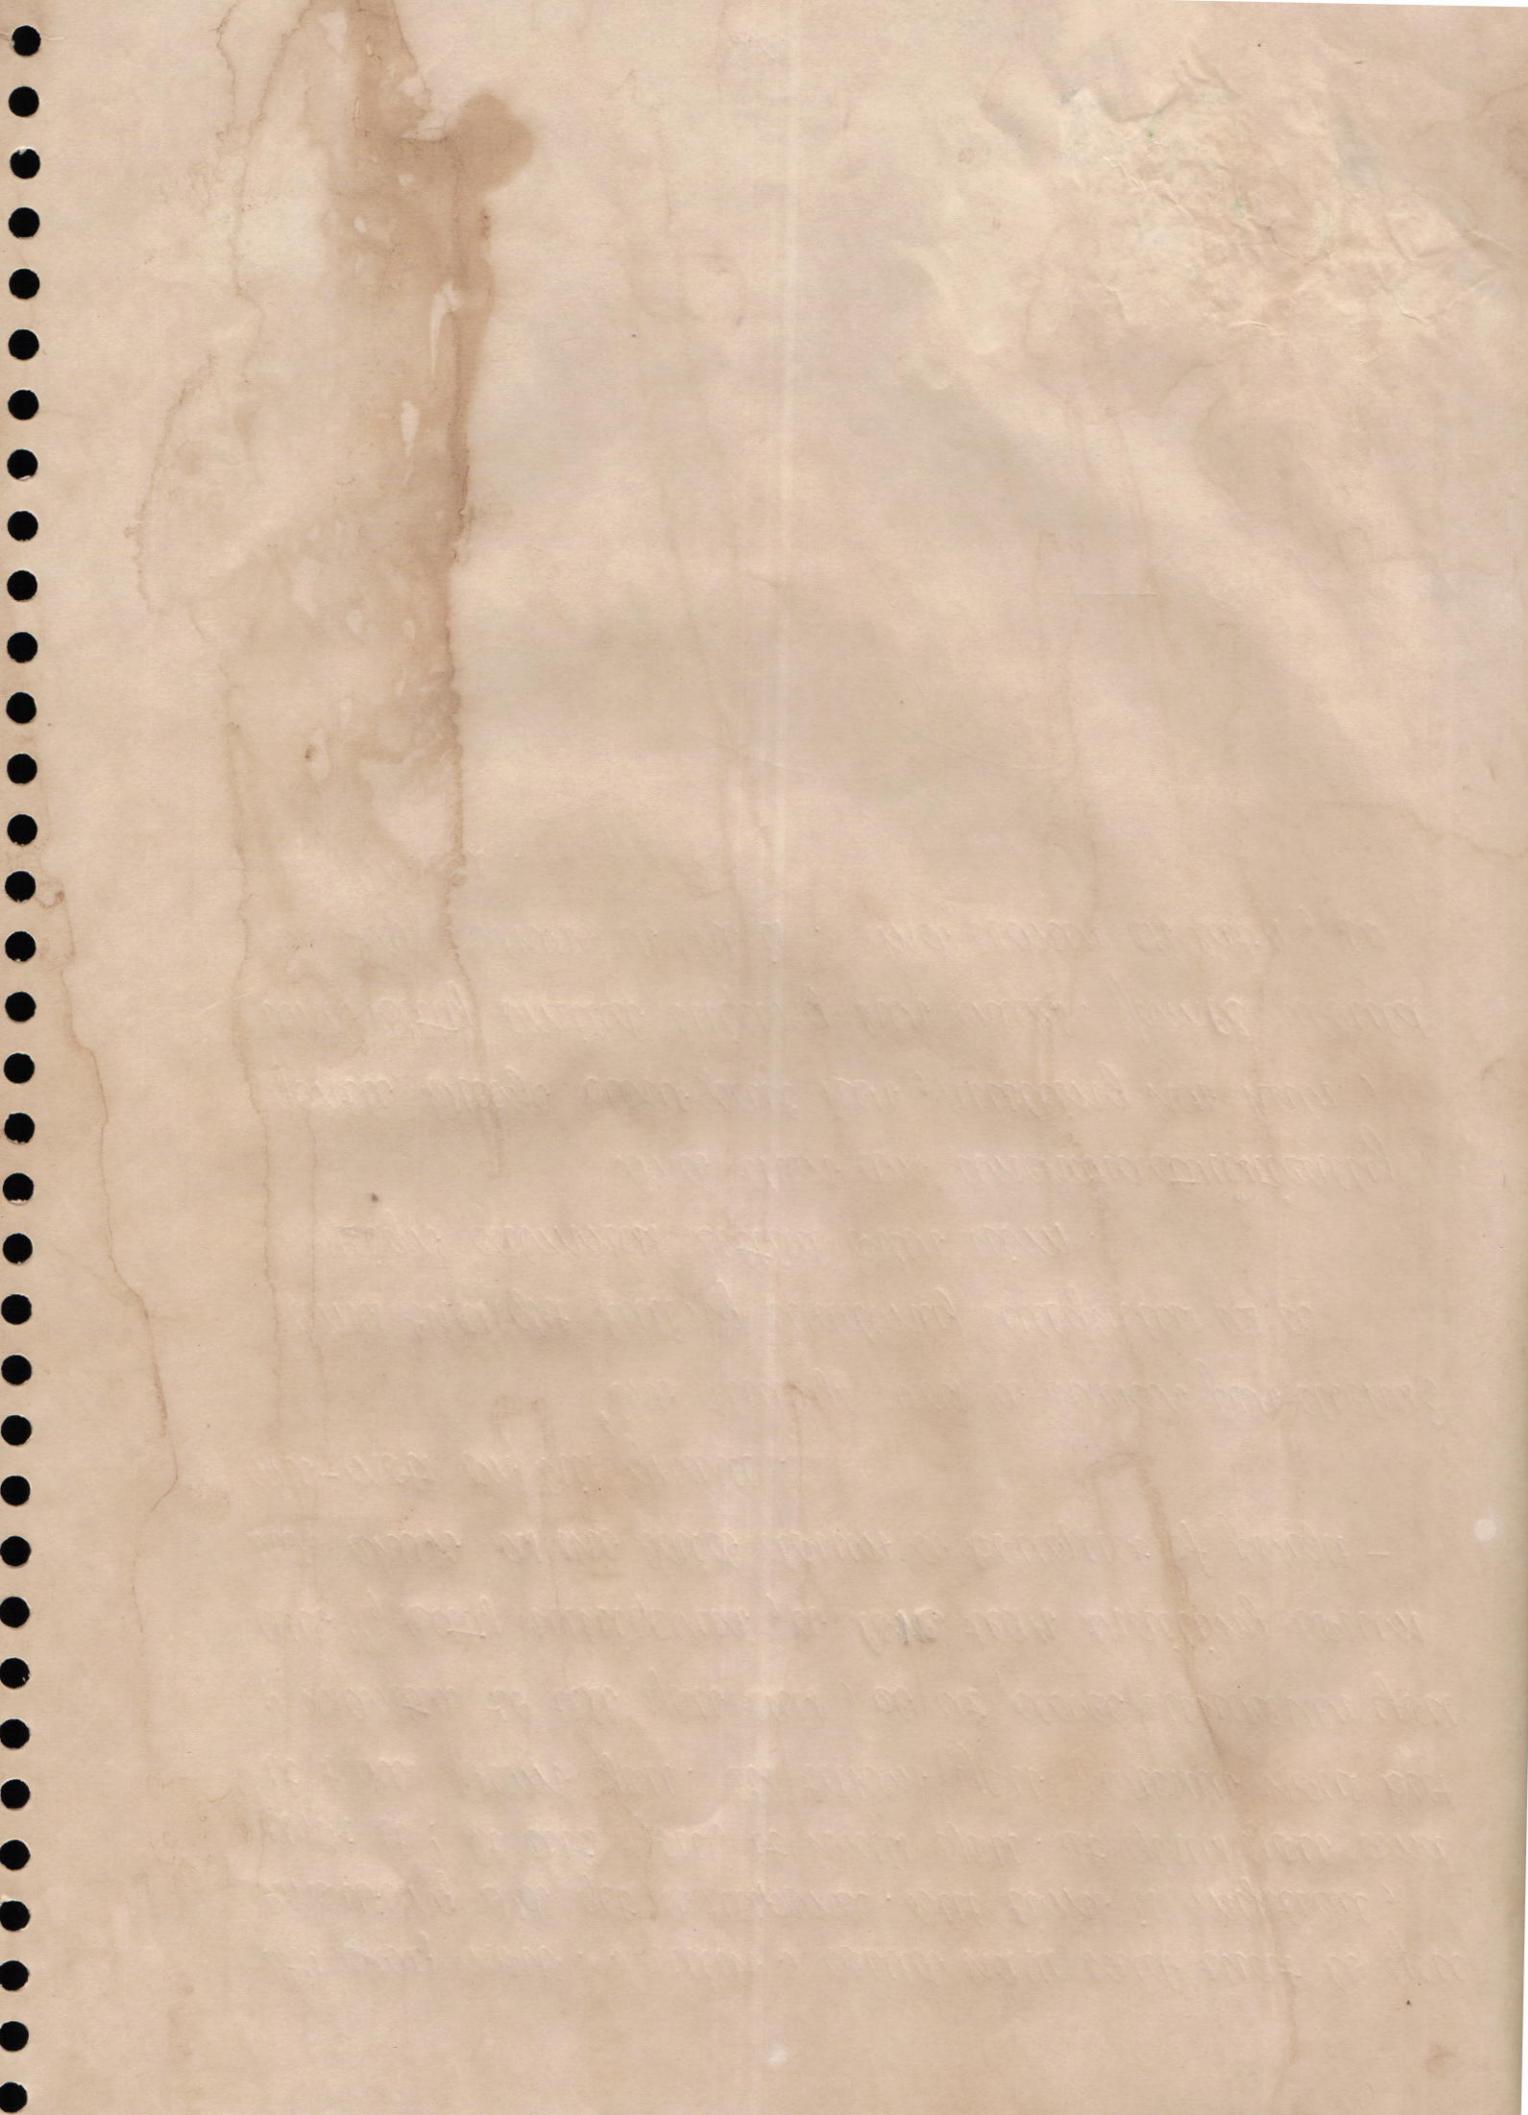

It's okay now. I wish I could have said that to you knowing I'd get a response. But time is mystical, isn't it? It cuts you, it heals you. It gives you and it takes from you. It's taken you forever now but I wanted to tell you this, be at peace wherever you are", Betty whispered, a lone tear trailing down her cheek as she laid down a bouquet of forget-me-nots on his grave.

"She always was a sucker for cliches," James thought feeling suddenly weightless as a foreign calmness settled over him.

And then an uncharacteristically gentle breeze blew past her, rustling her hair, and Betty smiled wiping her cheeks. James would be okay, wherever he is. And sooner or later, so would she.

Travelogue....

PETRICHOR OF THE ETERNAL ROMANCE

From the land of Aniruddh - Rhythm of the pitter patter of the raindrops wished me morning on 31st July. I woke up in a daze and realizing that the day I was looking forward to for weeks has finally arrived, my excitement couldn't be kept at bay. It was the day the long awaited family trip comes in execution. Our destination was Tezpur - the land of eternal romance.

We set out from home at 7 am in the morning and after a long and fun filled ride of 5 hours, we finally reached our destination at around 12 in the afternoon. The sky was loomed over by dark clouds threatening us of a downpour.
It stood firm on its threat because by the time we reached the town of Tezpur, it was raining cats and dogs. I have always loathed the rain from this reason. It ruins the things I look forward to. The falling raindrops act as an arch nemesis to the safe execution of my travel plans.

Our first stop was Mahabhairab temple. However, on reaching our destination, we had to be stuck in the parking area because of the heavy rainfall. We stayed there for about half an hour, but then realizing that the rain isn't expected to cease anytime soon, we decided to make a (run) go through it. We did the darshan after hustling through the rain. The famous practice of whispering wish into the ears of nandi maharaj had to be fulfilled by us now that we were in the Mahabhairab temple. It is not something we ought to miss while being here. So, after wishing our wishes to be fulfilled, we set out of the temple.

The rain had become a drizzle by the time we set out from the hotel we had lunched at after our visit to the temple. Our next stop was Agnigarh, the famous viewpoint of Tezpur. When we got to the top, the lover in me breathed a new life, Be it rain or sun, the love of my dear heart, the land of Tezpur, will always be the most beautiful. The sight of the calm Brahmaputra and the passionate greenery, both dancing along the ballet of the raindrops, felt like a walk on the softest feathers. The land I long for is really just so ethereal.

As strong was my desire to remain rooted at the viewpoint of Agnigarh, we had to leave before the dusk set in. So we set out to our next destination, the Kanaklata park. There wasn't much to see there but parks are always something fun. We clicked a lot of pictures there and before we knew it, it was time to leave, not just the park, but the town as well.

I was saddened at the thought of leaving. Isn't it a harsh truth that the things we long for the most, we can't get enough of them. They end on disappear on yade before we savour them to the fullest. The trip felt just too short to me.

My biggest regret during the journey was not being able to visit the Tezpur University due to the race between the time and the itinerary. It is the institution I wish to go to, so hopes are intact that one day I might be able to not only visit, but make a home there. Hence, after an apparently long day, which in actually felt too short, we eventually headed home.

As we journeyed back home, events of the day made me wish to live it all over again. To be honest, rain does seem bad most of the time but hustling through it today didn't seem as bad. Perhaps the beauty it casted on the land of the love of the lover in me was what made it not so loathsome? Now that I think of it, the land indeed invokes the longing resembling a lover's in one's heart. Therefore, I closed my eyes and revelled on the memories of the day and in the course of it all, the essence of the petrichor of the eternal romance decorated the air around me.

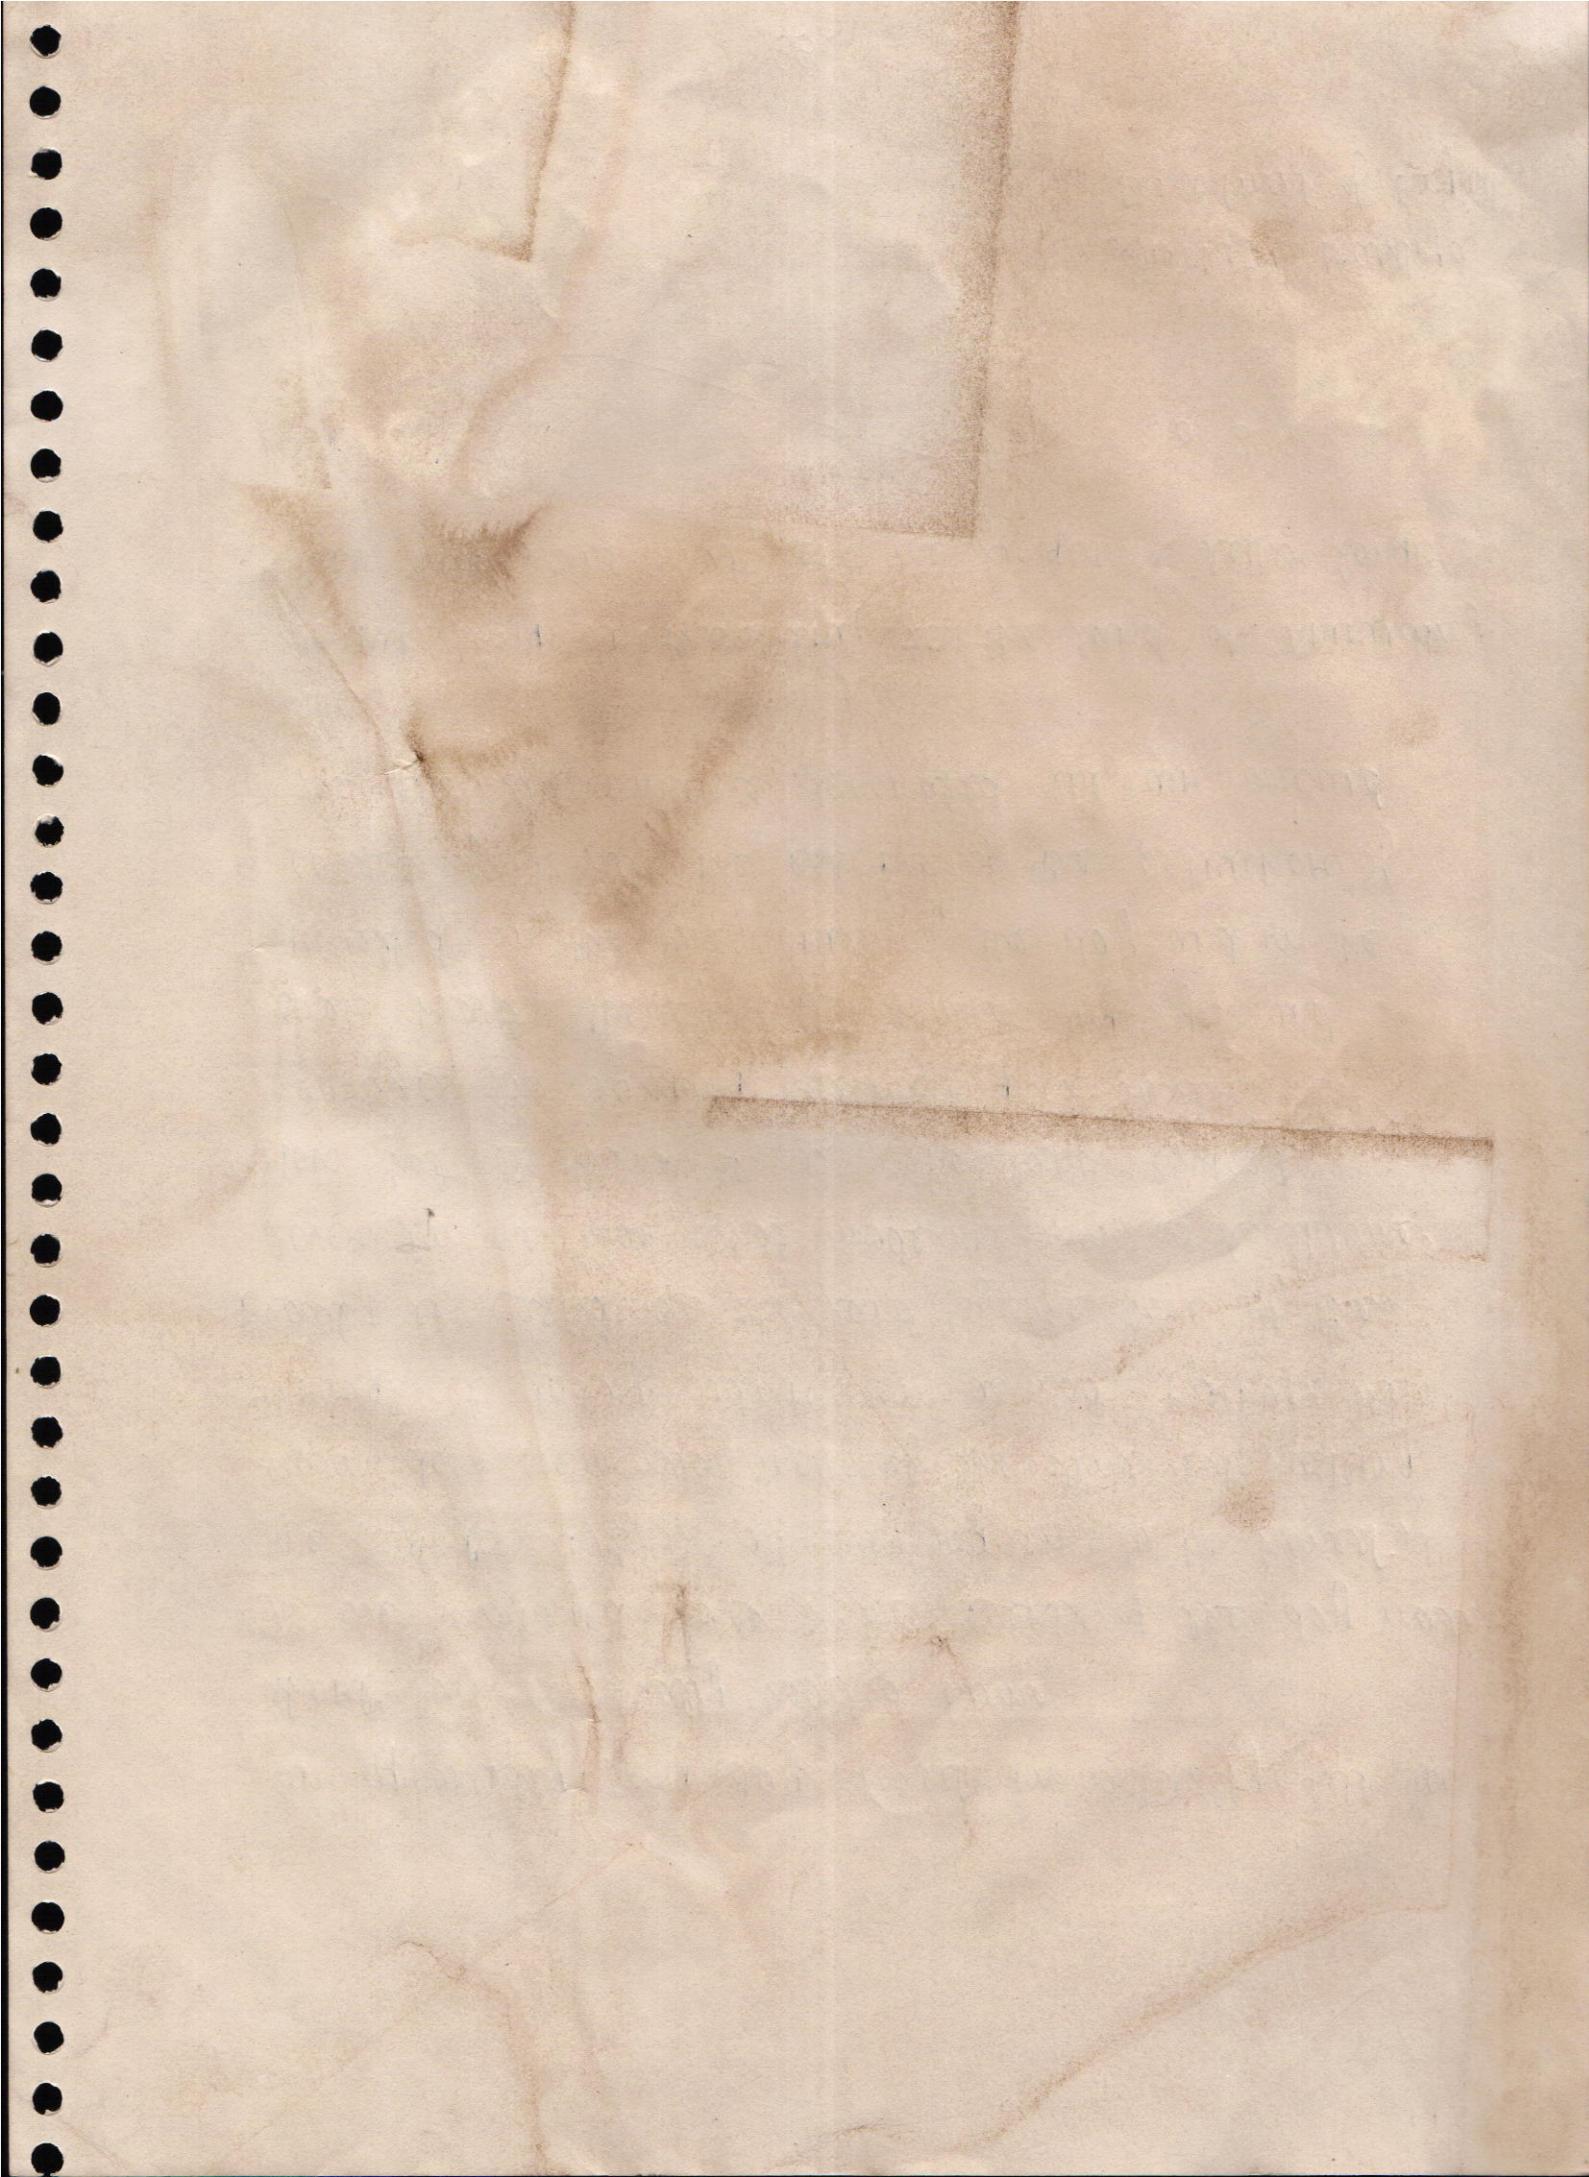

Manifesting another trip to the land of Aniruddha; this time, one that lets me linger a little longer.

Movie Review....

KOTHANODI, THE RIVER OF FAIBLES

Based on Assamese folk tales called "Buchi Mair Sadhu", Koñhanodi is an award winning Assamese movie, premiered at the 20th Busan International Film Festival held from 1 to 10 October, 2015. With the stories born in the land itself, the movie, a combination of 4 different folk tales, gives a dark touch to the unconditional love, greed, madness and possession of the mothers. The director, Bhaskar Hazarika, popular for another one of his notable movies "Aamis", weaves the stories with a new outlook, adding an interesting mixture of whimsy and depth. Not a horreore movie, but the eerie background music, the narration and the screenplay makes the movie quite creepy, chilling and a treat to the thriller enthusiasts. "What can be seen... is unseen. And what can't be seen... is revealed"; the stories may sound quite absurd at times; a mother followed around by an elephant apple (ou-terga), a step-mother kills her daughter in the absence of her husband, a girl gets married to a snake who later gets eaten by him, and lastly, a man who buries his child that are being born. Kolhanodi is well-coiffed, directed and narrated in a sophisticated manner, not to mention the excellent execution of all the actors. It might not be everyone's cup of tea, but definitely a must-watch for all the movie lovers.
